Dear Parents,

I write at the beginning of the first complete week of this latest lockdown to thank you firstly for the great start your children made last week with the work delivered through Google Classroom and Tapestry.

Towards the end of this week, as I mentioned in my previous letter, we are planning to introduce a short live 'registration' session for each class each morning as well as giving your child the opportunity to access a workshop each week. I plan to write tomorrow with details of how this will work.

I am also writing as, on Friday evening, we received new guidance from the Department for Education around the provision of school places for children of critical (key worker) parents, and I need to make you aware of this. The guidance remains that children with at least one parent who is a critical (key) worker can go to school if required, even if the key worker parent is working from home. However, and this is new, the guidance now says that parents who are critical (key) workers should keep their children at home if they can. This is to reduce overall social contact.

I appreciate that this is new guidance, and that the situation seems to be ever changing, and I will continue to keep you updated as soon as I receive new information.

With best wishes,

Grace
